My sire, my brethren Spartas princes are; Mine were the coursers, mine the conqring car: Twas I, Cynisca, I that raisd this stone, I won the wreath, mid Grecian maids alone. On a Statue of Cupid by Praxiteles. Well has the sculptor what he felt expressd, He drew the living model from his breast. Will not his Phryne the design approve, Me for myself exchanging, love for love Lost is my fabled bow and magic dart; But, only gazed upon, I win the heart. Anacreon flourished 533 B. C. He was born at Teos, a sea-port town in Ionia, 554 years before the Christian era; according to Plato he was descended of an illustrious family, that of Codrus, the last king of Athens. Anacreon and Pindar have been considered by some as the fathers of lyric poetry, the works of the former however, are a great contrast to those of the latter; the fancy of the first suggests only familiar and luxurious images; Anacreon appears to have no comprehension of the sublime, he contents himself with the easy and the graceful, and was a man of voluptuous habits, and lax morality. His odes are still extant, they are distinguished by great beauty and elegance. He died in his 85th year, choked with a grape-stone whilst regaling on some new wine. ODE...
